THE TRUE STORY OF CHICKEN BOY

Chicken Boy is perhaps America's most awe-inspiring advertising icon. Formerly the spokesmodel for the fast food restaurant for which he is named, he is now pursuing a career in the film industry in Hollywood, doing endorsements.

TOO TALL TO LIVE

He started his career in Los Angeles. Downtown Los Angeles to be exact. Broadway between 4th and 5th to pin it down even further. He stood atop the three-story building which housed the Chicken Boy Fried Chicken Store for a generation. When Southern California's chicken tastes changed and his management failed to anticipate the Mexican charbroiled chicken revolution, Chicken Boy's goose looked cooked.

But, as fate would have it, two hot chicken tacos from Mars came along and took him away to a romantic U-lock-it facility, where he is currently residing while he awaits the call.

TOO WEIRD TO DIE

Currently, he is awaiting news on some development deals and working on his autobiography. He is also willing to consider serious, career-enhancing employment offers. In addition to his experience in spokesmodelship, which believe you me, is a lot harder than it looks, he also has worked as a celebrity icon in a number of motion pictures, including Poltergeist 3. And, for you hunk watchers, his stats are incredible: 22 feet tall and 500 pounds of powerful, dimensionally stable, perma-pressed fiberglass (zero body fat!). He is easy-going, a real professional, a pleasure to work with, and he would be an asset to any project.
